"Our only hope," Gridley said, "is the U.S. Public Health Department. It's our ace in the hole. It's probably the only thing that's going to get something forthcoming."

NOT EVERYONE was pleased with all the attention. A spokesman for South San Diego City Councilwoman Lucy Killea said the councilwoman was "distressed" at the action taken by Imperial Beach's mayor and City Council.

Wilkens said San Diego officials met just last week with Baja Gov. Roberto de la Madrid to discuss the sewage problems in the South Bay.

Wilkens said his office had tried to contact Bilbray several times about the upcoming meeting, but for some reason, contact was never made.

HE ADDED that San Diego officials have made an "unprecedented effort" to react to the sewage problem.

Tijuana officials reportedly are designing temporary pumps to be placed in a manhole from which sewage has been flowing to the river for months.

If those pumps are feasible, most, but not all of the sewage will be contained. The Mexican government reportedly still is working on reconstruction of its entire sewage treatment plant, a process that could take another three to four months, according to San Diego officials.

Imperial Beach officials have scoffed at those plans, saying they do not think it will solve the problem. But they are still hopeful something will come out of their attempts.

"Right now, we've got the federal government's attention," Bilbray said. "I'm gonna give them seven days. But (over the weekend) I'm dreading a phone call from a parent who says his kid's got hepatitis."
